Do not assume everyone speaks a General American accent! The IPA addresses these problems by having unique symbols for every sound found around the world, and can even account for regional accents. Vulgar does also create a "spelling convention" for the language (which is the bold blue text) which can be controlled in the Spelling options. ă Many well known languages, such as Spanish and Italian, have the vowel ă. However this vowel very is often simply written as a, so long as the language doesn't have true a, and so long as it is specified that a represents a "central low" vowel for the purpose of the document. For starters, there are around 120 distinct consonant and vowel sounds found in languages world-wide (as you will see below). This is a fairly normal practice among linguists, to avoid excessive diacritic usage. Consonants Click IPA symbols for audio Coarticulated consonants Non-pulmonic consonants Vowels a vs. Even if you were to say ɔ is pronounced as in so, not to, this does not account for regional accents. It's important to know that Vulgarlang bases everything on IPA: when you are choosing the sound of your language, you are choosing the IPA sounds; when you create custom words for your language, you are writing the words in their pronounced IPA form. With only 26 letters available in the English alphabet, there is a need for a system that can represent sounds that aren't found in English. The English alphabet is not suitable for documenting the precise pronunciation of words in other languages.
